WORKING PAPER

Target #: 6604
Date: 5 June 90
Time: 0933-1440
Viewer: 052
Session: 01

SUMMARY OF INFORMATION:

The target is a male person. He has short dark hair, either brown or black, his eye color varies from blue to brown, and his skin color from red to white. He is wearing a blue, pin-stripped suit, white shirt, brown socks, black shoes and a hat. He is tall, medium to skinny build, and middle aged (older than me). He is strong, energetic, powerful, happy, hard-working, learning, religious, political and confused. He is (healthy and dead.) He makes me feel uneasy. He reminds me of Gorbachov, Hitler, and a military, SS uniform with black boots and a belt; German. At the height of his career his principal activity was vocal; talking, singing and speaking.

I see his outline with a tall, dark, long, vertical, in the middle where his body should be. The first time I saw him he was with three other shapes. (?)

There is a small blue square, with a circle in it, and a yellow triangle within the circle. The entire square is crossed by a diagonal.

'Hotel Terminus': A Grainy Look at a Ghostly Torturer

By Hal Hinson
Washington Post Staff Writer

In Marcel Ophuls' "Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie," Barbie himself is onscreen only for a scant few minutes, yet his spirit falls across the movie like a shadow.

Throughout the film, we're shown photos of this man, known as "the butcher of Lyons" for the crimes he committed as Nazi Gestapo chief from 1942 to 1944, but they barely register. This is because the images of him we've made for ourselves are more vivid than the ones we're shown. And this withholding isn't accidental. Ophuls has kept him from us intentionally, knowing that the monster we imagine is more formidable than the man himself. And so when Barbie is finally brought before the camera, in a brief interview, we're almost mythically underwhelmed. Watching him, we can't believe that reality has been so poorly cast.

This is only one of the insoluble ironies elucidated in this profound and pro-
